

“Who said we aren’t innovative?” questioned senior Cassidy Metzinger as she and four of her classmates dug through the garbage cart outside the shop where they were building their float. With very little money in the class fund, seniors found themselves utilizing whatever they could find.

Students Survive Chaos of Pride Day

By Julia Schmitt, sophomore

Although Pride Day can sometimes be mass chaos, there is a lot to be accomplished every year. Each grade, seventh through twelfth, is split into groups, some build the class float and others do community service projects. The proudly built floats were paraded around on homecoming, Friday, September 19.

The senior class followed tradition and painted the American flag, flanked by their year of graduation (2015). The junior class painted windows to match the “videogames” theme. Sophomores, freshmen, and the junior high worked on more long term projects that would spruce up the community, like painting the fair grounds.

Sophomore Tony Bauman said, “It was hard work and it was nice to get out in the community.”

No matter where each student was in the meticulously organized mass chaos, efforts paid off and the help given to the community was well appreciated.

Members of the senior class prep the side of the building so that they can begin painting the flag.
